

Ioannis Xydopoulos studied both as an undergraduate and a Ph.D. student at the Aristotle University of Thessaloniki, Greece, where he has been teaching Ancient Greek History since 2001 (currently as a Professor). The author of several works on ancient Archaic and Classical Macedonia, beginning with his published thesis Social and Economic Relations between Macedonians and the Other Greeks, Thessaloniki 1998 (rev. ed. 2006), his interests later centered specifically on Roman Macedonia, which was the subject of three extensive papers. He has been dealing also with issues of identities and perceptions in the periphery of the Greek world, as can be seen in his second book entitled The Perception of Ancient Thracians in Classical Greek Historiography, Thessaloniki 2007 and many papers on tribes living in Asia Minor, Thrace and around the Black Sea. His latest interests lay on the notions of violence and fear in Antiquity. Co-editor of the collective volume Violence and Community: Law, Space and Identity in the Ancient Eastern Mediterranean World, Routledge, London and New York 2017, together with K. Vlassopoulos and E. Tounta, he has recently written a book on the notion of fear in 4th century Athens and its influence on the Athenian foreign policy of the period.
